

WOMAN SLASHES HER DEFAMER WITH A RAZOR

Lorange Talked About Her
After She Spurned Him,
Mrs. Caepana Says.

Several patrons were being shaved this afternoon in Kelly's barber shop, at No. 185 East One Hundred and Twenty-third street, which, despite the Hibernian sound of the name, is owned by a Sicilian. Anello Lorange, a rather good looking chap of thirty-five, with curling black mustache, was busy lathering a patron in the second chair. The owner dozed over an Italian newspaper in the corner.

A stout young woman with a child in her arms stepped softly in at the open door. She dropped the child into a handy chair. Then she snatched up a razor lying on a shelf and with a scream of rage launched herself at Lorange, the guardian of the second chair.

Before he could move to defend himself she had made a long swipe at his face that sheared off one of the upturned horns of his black mustache and lopped off the lobe of his ear.

Slashed Again in Flight.
There were plenty of other razors lying about, and Lorange might have made it a duel on even terms, but he didn't fancy the taste of any more steel in his face. He dodged under the woman's arm and ran out, leaving a wide red trail behind and yelling and praying at every jump.

The woman followed, cursing him in Sicilian, and the occupants of the shop—except, of course, the young baby—and the unattached population of "Little Italy" in turn followed her. The woman could run nearly as fast as the man she had wounded. He thought he saw a haven of refuge in a coal and wood cellar at No. 177 East One Hundred and Twenty-third street, but just as he leaped down the steps from the sidewalk the manager of the basement emporium, seeing that his premises were likely to be brought into bad repute, slammed the door and locked it from the inside.

The desperate barber turned to go back up the area steps. The woman was waiting for him, and this time her razor ripped open the whole side of his head from the left temple down across the jawbone and cheek down to the point of the chin. The blood poured in a wider stream, but he kept going.

Drops in the Street.

As he turned into Lexington avenue and headed north the hunted man began to stagger from exhaustion. As he dropped, all in an instant, James Condon, a young chap who lives at No. 232 Second avenue, grabbed the frantic woman from behind just as she was aiming a blow at Lorange's throat. While he was struggling to hold her back, Detective McGowan, who was going home from court, jumped off a trolley car and wrested the razor from her hand.

Disarmed, the woman began to sob, and in a minute she was in the midst of hysterics of the approved Little Italy brand, which is noisy and marked by much pulling of the hair and beating of the breast.

After she reached the East One Hundred and Twenty-sixth street station the woman calmed down and told her story. She was Angelina Caepana, the twenty-five-year-old wife of Michael Caepana a laborer. The baby was her first.

Lorange, the man she tried to kill, was a boarder in the flat of the Caepanas at No. 323 East One Hundred and Seventh street. Two weeks ago, so she said, he made love to her and she chased him out of the house with a flat iron. Since then, so she claimed, he had been destroying her good name by loose talk against her. That was why she carved him.

Somebody brought the abandoned young one from the barber shop and she went to a cell, nursing the baby.

Dr. Moockel landed her victim in the Harlem Hospital after a record run in the ambulance. At the hospital it was stated that he would die.

SET FREE AND RE-ARRESTED.

Boy Accused of Pushing Playmate to Death in the Hudson.

Frank Fornica, fifteen years old, of No. 221 East One Hundred and Twelfth street, was arraigned in the Children's Court this morning, charged with killing a fifteen-year-old playmate, Joseph Giordano, whom he admitted pushing from a raft at One Hundred and Forty-fifth street and the Hudson River yesterday while they were about to bathe. Justice Olmsted discharged Fornica, but told him to go to the Coroner's office.

A Great Summer Sale of Wanamaker Quality Shoes for Men and Women

Several thousand pairs of fine shoes are involved—chiefly in our well-known splendid Wanamaker Grades at $3.90, $5 and $6. The "best sellers" of the season—for it is precisely these that first show gaps in the size ranges. To fill in takes too long—five or six weeks—so we prefer to clear out the incomplete lots and concentrate on the lines that remain.

Many desirable styles are included, for men and women, in all sorts of leathers. And all sizes are to be found in each price-group; though the presence of small, choice lots puts a premium on prompt picking. It is the greatest shoe news of the Summer, coming at the very beginning of the season and just before a holiday—a month earlier than we should ordinarily announce it. Details:
